Groupe La Poste subsidiary Docapost builds its digital transformation expertise by acquiring Ametix, a specialist in digital consulting.

The takeover will give Docapost a full-service offering to support its customers' major digital transformation projects, drawing on the scarce and highly sought-after skills of the Ametix consultants, who include web developers, web designers and big data specialists.

Set up in 2011 by three start-up founders, Patrick Bunan, Vincent Klingbeil and Stéphane Boukris, Ametix has developed a creative strategy combining technical support and digital consulting with human resources services. Ametix has honed innovative recruitment techniques to address the scarcity of the skills required for digital transformations, for example by holding events like the "Best Developer in France" competition.

This approach has brought Ametix steady, rapid growth. It now has a staff of 200, posted revenue of €14 million in 2016 and is aiming for a steep rise in 2017. As part of Le Groupe La Poste, Ametix will pursue its development while retaining its brand and its identity, since the three founders will remain at the head of the company.

"The acquisition of Ametix will boost our digital expertise and give us the core skills necessary to carry out any digital transformation strategy," said Docapost CEO Olivier Vallet.

Docapost helps its customers - companies, government departments and local authorities - make the switch to digital technology for communicating with their customers, suppliers, employees or citizens. It leverages its expertise in technology and industry to optimise business processes (HR, finance, CRM or IT) and sector-specific processes (banking, insurance, e-health or e-administration).
